My personal website is for potential employers. I want them to know what skills I have as a programmer, so I want to display projects I have done, my resume, and a clean website. My hope is that the website should have a very polished, minimalistic feel, so I can easily draw their attention to the important areas.

While I want to present myself in a professional manner, I also want my website to have a personal touch. Because of this, I want to add a section on TV shows that I watch. I hope that this will allow people to see me as more than just a programmer.

I looked at several of my friends' websites to see how they present themselves and decided that it is important to have links to my Github, LinkedIn, resume, and projects that I have done. This is also how I decided that it would be nice to have a personal touch to make mine different from theirs. I saw one that was a continuous page, but had links to different sections of the page to feel like a multi-page set up, which seemed interesting. Eventually though, I decided I would prefer to separate the information.

When I was changing from M1 to M2, I decided I really was not a fan of having a lot of information on one page. So I thought about what my different sections were and decided that I would have a page for my resume, project, and TV shows.

Currently my resume page just has my professional information. In the future I would like to add a link to a PDF version of my resume for people to download. I don't know how I want this page formatted yet as I don't know what parts I should emphasize yet.

The projects page is a serious work in progress. That is mostly because I don't know what I would put up there right now, but I see that being a page that I could use in the near future, so I included it.

Eventually the TV page will include some details on the shows. In the future I will add some photos here and probably some of my favorite quotes!

I started to think about how I want my site formatted. I decided I really like the looks of sites that have the navigation bar under the person's name. That is one of the features I want to add for M3. I also feel like my site will need some color, so that is also a future goal. I also would like to add more images. Personally, I am a fan of the Github and LinkedIn links being images.

I want my theme to be extremely minimalistic. I don't want my page to seem cluttered at all. I feel like that is more professional looking and since I want this for potential employers, I will keep it clean.

- Do you have any suggestions on formatting my resume?
- Do you have any other suggestions of professional details that I should include?
